There has never been a more exciting time to become involved with the Western Australian Museum. We are entering a new era of opportunities and challenges, but as we strive to meet these, so the demands on our resources become even greater. As a result, we rely increasingly on the philanthropic support of people who share our passion for the natural world and our cultural heritage to ensure they are sustained for future generations.

There has never been a more exciting time to become involved with the Western Australian Museum.

The Western Australian Museum Foundation plays a critical role in encouraging public and private investment in the Museum through sponsorship, direct donation, gifts and bequests, providing individuals and corporations with an opportunity to do something very worthwhile for their State.

Your donation will enable us to preserve the rich legacy of our past while contributing to the future understanding and protection of life on earth.

Take an active role in shaping the future of the natural world

By becoming a supporter of the Western Australian Museum, you will play a significant role in the preservation of our environment. The threat to biodiversity, the variety of life on Earth, including bacteria, fungi, plants and animals, has been identified as the most important environmental issue facing Australia. The primary cause of this threat is habitat damage through human activity. We are losing species at a frightening rate. The work of the Western Australian Museum, including critical scientific research, identifies threatened species so steps can be taken to maintain the natural ecosystem of Western Australia's wildlife and preserve living species for future generations.

Our Vision

The Western Australian Museum's vision is to help all visitors to better understand themselves, their environment (natural, social and built) and their place in the world.

The Museum is helping to establish this awareness and appreciation of the State's natural environment and cultural heritage through its community programmes and the research undertaken by its curators.

With your support, we can maintain and develop the State's scientific and cultural collections, and use them, in conjunction with groundbreaking research, to take a leading role in safeguarding the future of our planet.

Research

The Museum has an international reputation in research. The Museum's scientists, archaeologists, anthropologists, historians and scholars support not only the important research into the vast and unique diversity of Western Australia, but also the dissemination of this rich heritage through public exhibitions, seminars and popular publications.

The Museum discovers and describes new species and investigates their role in ecosystem function. We also investigate human influence on the natural environment to help the understanding and conservation of the State's biodiversity.

Your support is vital to ensuring that the Museum continues its progressive research, combating species extinction and reclaiming polluted environments.

Collections

The Western Australian Museum is the keeper of the State's largest collection of natural science and cultural heritage treasures, comprising more than three million objects, from Megamouth Megachasma pelgios, one of the world's rarest sharks, to the largest Western Australian Aboriginal collection.

With your support, we can continue the conservation and enhancement of the Western Australian Museum's collections, both for today and for future generations.

Learning

The Western Australian Museum's aim is to enthuse, empower and enable people to gain a genuine understanding of science, culture and the world around them.

Through the Museum's exhibitions, displays, interactive school holiday programmes, hands-on learning at the Discovery Centre and its public museum@work seminars, people learn about our natural world, increasing their knowledge and appreciation of nature. Your support can further enhance this education.
